New Civil Defense Program

A new Civil Defense Program to train the American people to meet their own health needs in a national emergency, is being formally presented to the health professions this fall by the U. S. Public Health Service Division of Health Mobilization in cooperation with the American Medical Association.

The new program, called the "Medical Self-Help Training Program" is built around the basic information a person needs to preserve life and health in a natural or man-made emergency. It is based on the assumption that those affected will have to care for themselves, using their own ingenuity and the resources on hand at the time of disaster.

The program was developed by the U. S. Public Health Service under contract with the Office of Civil Defense Mobilization, with assistance and advice from the American Medical Association Council on National Security and Committee on Disaster Medical Care.

The introduction is being made at three workshops to be given in Brooklyn, N.Y., Alameda, Calif., and Battle Creek, Mich. Approximately 100 people have been invited to each meeting. These include state health officers, state civil defense directors, state directors of education and representatives of state medical societies. The American Nurses' Association has been invited to send a representative to one of the workshops.

The participants will be oriented to the proposed training program, advised on its content and implementation, and obtain training kits to take back to their states for use in developing state programs. (From October Journal of Nursing)
